NIHSA has taken a bold step in opening up its retail, aviation and broadcasting sectors to foreign investment. Investors should welcome it all if the more it appears to signal a break in the past that has contributed to many privatisation reforms that have failed. While the process is slow, the government has evidently started on the right path. The next steps are crucial.

The aim is to establish a free trade zone, and to encourage foreign investment. The government has set aside a 51 per cent ceiling on foreign investment in the country’s economy, but there are concerns about how this will be implemented.

Mr Thura Shwe Man favours a more liberal economy, but is close to the military, which is still a powerful force in the country. Mr Thura Shwe Man has emphasised the need for foreign investment, but the military has been cautious about how this will be implemented.

The government has already signed agreements with several companies, including Walmart and Tesco, to invest in the country. These agreements have been met with mixed reactions, with some people concerned about the impact of foreign investment on the local economy.

Mr Thura Shwe Man has also emphasised the importance of democracy. He has been a vocal supporter of free speech, and has encouraged people to express their views. However, some people are concerned that this might lead to a loss of control.

In conclusion, the government has taken a bold step in opening up its economy to foreign investment. However, there are still concerns about how this will be implemented, and how the military will respond. The government needs to work closely with investors, and to ensure that the process is transparent and fair.

President Thein Sein and opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi have marked historic visits to the United States, as the parliamentary Speaker Thura Shwe Man visited Australia and Singapore. Their messages were consistent: Myanmar is reforming, The reform is genuine and irreversible. And the Myanmar people are leading their own reforms. From the rule of critics to landmark elections, this is a new era.
